The French invasion of Russia, also known as the Russian campaign (French: Campagne de Russie) and in Russia as the Patriotic War of 1812 (Russian: Бородинское сражение), was a major military campaign during the Napoleonic Wars. It resulted in a decisive Russian victory over Napoleon's army. The Russian army, led by Alexander I and Mikhail Kutuzov, defeated Napoleon's army of over 100,000 men in the Battle of Borodino on September 7, 1812. The Russian army then pursued Napoleon's army out of Russia, leading to the final defeat of Napoleon at the Battle of Waterloo in 1815. The Russian army's victory in 1812 was a turning point in the Napoleonic Wars, as it marked the end of Napoleon's invincibility and the beginning of his decline. The Russian army's victory was also a major boost to Russian national pride and a symbol of Russian military strength. The Russian army's victory in 1812 was a major factor in the eventual defeat of Napoleon. The Russian army's victory was also a major factor in the eventual defeat of Napoleon.
