Their mysterious demise helped ...

Mysterious dying fish revealed the Congo as the world's deepest river

An American Museum of Natural History-led team spotted blind, pale cichlid fish

While finding out the cause, they discovered the river was deeper than any other on Earth!

Researchers found the Congo's currents create strong jets that shoot to the surface that can launch fish hundreds of feet, where they die from the bends

They say this pressure change from waters over 650 ft deep to shallow waters caused dissolved gases to form bubbles inside the cichlid's blood and body tissue

The Congo's strong currents, raging rapids, and "submerged waterfalls" physically separate fish allowing new species to evolve, even with little distance separating the animals

The findings were presented at the annual American Geophysical Union meeting
