Refugee Crisis, Religion, Secularism, Security, International Politics

This book explores the complex intersection of the refugee crisis, religion, secularism, security, and hospitality within the realm of international politics. It offers critical perspectives on how religion influences and is influenced by the refugee crisis, examining the roles of secularism and security concerns in shaping responses to displacement. Furthermore, it questions conventional notions of hospitality in the context of mass migration and religious diversity, providing a nuanced analysis of these interconnected issues.
