Intro

Protect Yourself

What will we be Covering Today? There's a really big problem, but it's not what you expect. Basically, advisors want to do well for their clients, mean to do well for their clients, but do a great deal of harm because they believe things that simply aren't true. They haven't kept up with the evidence. It seems many advisors seldom think for themselves There's an agency issue here... whose interests do advisors look out for? They're supposed to be working for their clients interests, but most are actually often unwittingly working for their employers and/ or product suppliers AT THE DIRECT EXPENSE of their clients.

What can you do?

Thinking is Hard COGNITIVE BIAS CHEAT SHEET

What is Right Matters

STANDUP Advisors Seek the Best Info

Who is on the other side of the trade?

No one wants to admit to being part of the problem

People need to maintain a sense of Perspective

Some advisors are closed-minded

It takes a long time for ideas to take hold

Even when the evidence is clear, people resist if they are threatened

Combine reasons 1 to 5 No one wants to admit they were wrong

What can you do if your advisor has good intentions, but nonetheless believes things that are not true?

To be clear, what exactly is bullshit?

Framing / Confirmation Bias: We are ALL hardwired to make quick (often wrong) decisions...

What matters is easy to understand, hard to do It's about focus and discipline

It is largely about our behaviour... specifically, the choices we make daily

Yet we 'double down' and dig in regarding pre-existing viewpoints

Q: How, exactly, can you tell if and how your advisor is biased... and how that impacts you? A: You need to ask tough questions.

Everyone does this

Which car represents the best value?

Which investment product represents the best value?

Clients pay for BOTH the cost of advice and the cost of investment products Most people are paying far more than they ought to because they fail to understand either how or how much their advisor is being paid AND how much the products they own actually cost.
