Many caregivers, both professionals and family members, experience at times, the wear and tear that results from offering care and compassion to others.

In addition, direct or secondary exposure to traumatic events or situations can bring about complicated feelings and emotions.

This presentation suggests ways to create your own toolbox for self-care and burnout prevention. Compassion is loving kindness towards someone, combined with the desire to take action to relieve suffering.

Compassion is an essential quality for helpers. When someone feels satisfaction from helping, that is known as compassion satisfaction.

Compassion Fatigue is the physical and mental exhaustion resulting in a depleted ability to cope.

During these times, it can be hard to refuel and regenerate.

Compassion fatigue can lead to anxiety and depression, it can compromise the Quality of care, and affect relationships with family members and even colleagues

Secondary trauma, also known as vicarious trauma, is the "contagious" trauma that occurs when helpers are repeatedly exposed to other's traumatic experiences.

Create a protection plan for yourself: pay attention to your feelings - make it a point to stop and check in with yourself during the day to see how you are feeling practice self-care by doing those things that recharge your battery maintain strong social supports at home and at work and have a transition from work to home - as this can help us let go of the trials of the day

Remember to practice being kind to yourself. Respond to your stress with care and support.

Caregiving can be challenging and rewarding. Practicing these simple strategies may help you avoid compassion fatigue and burnout
