Stalemate, it's a stalemate on the battlefield to, oh my God, we're losing to Nigeria with snow. I mean, that's the rather dramatic change in the propaganda narrative, and I think we can see it reflected in the political elite as well with the panic and desperation that is starting to sit in and become rather obvious among European leaders who really have the most to lose from this conflict, rather other than the Kiev regime in Ukraine itself. And this all occurs, these latest incidents in the final weeks of and the aftermath of the Russian breakthrough of the Kiev regime's most heavily fortified fortress city, these extensive defenses and fortifications trenches, concrete bunkers, pill boxes, networks of tunnels, layers of minefields, you name it, Inca, which is really quite close to Dan City, and a western journalist a couple of years ago already referred to it rather poetically if quite awfully as a knife pointed at the heart of Dansk.

They meant that in a good way. Another way, of course, looking at it was a Jack boot pressed to the neck of the people of Donbass because it is from aca and the settlements shielded behind it that the Ki regime forces brutally shelled the people of Dansk for the last decade pretty much regularly. They didn't shell military facilities, they shelled civilian areas with artillery, with cluster munitions, with pedal mines. And this was to punish the people of done bus for choosing wrong, for not accepting the overthrow of the government by the Westback Maan butch back in 2014, and with the intention with driving Russian ethnic people who did not accept the new Ukraine into Russia. That was the intention and one of the primary reasons for the Russian intervention in the Ukrainian civil conflict, not the only one. There were security concerns as well, but this was loudly voiced as well.

POWER Both the formal structure of governmental power and the actual competition for power reflect a lack of centralization in the political system.

COMPETITION Competition for power includes conflicts among the branches of government, within the two major political parties, and continual fighting for position among interest groups.

LEVERAGE Wide dispersal of political power both constrains and creates opportunities for stakeholders to gain leverage in an area of policy.

AUTHORITY Most of the time legislators delegate to administrators the authority necessary to craft specific meaning into provisions of the law and then to implement them.

... for bureaucracy, from a relatively solid base of political, ...

RELATIONSHIPS Second, the amount of independence bureaucratic agencies have in any specific situation is influenced by the power relationships they have with other politicians and institutions.

... quest for "sufficient power," bureaucratic, agencies seek ...

DECISION-MAKING On the other hand, government institutions also serve as arenas of political competition, where various forces contend for dominant influence in decision-making processes.

TACTICS Also at issue every time Congress makes a decision is control of the way the question is presented, possible amendments, use of numerous tactics to speed up or delay consideration, and other tactical questions.

BALANCE Administrative agencies try to strike a manageable balance between what they can do to further their own interests and what they must do to ensure their survival.
