The Military Destruction of Slavery in Southeast Missouri

This is not just another book on slavery, but rather on its demise, in Southeast Missouri during the Civil War. It also is not a chronology of the Civil War in that region. However, without the Civil War and the Military, slavery would have continued. This opinion is sustained by decades of political maneuvering on both the State and Federal levels which actually strengthened the institution. Too, during the War, when the Southern Slave States were not represented in the US Congress, northern politicians, including President Lincoln, could not agree on how to dismantle the system. It is wondered, that if the Conflict had ended after a year or had the Seceding States voted to return to the Union, if not slavery would have been continued unabated.

On the Road to Total War

The Routledge Handbook of the History of Race and the American Military provides an important overview of the main themes surrounding race in the American military establishment from the French and Indian War to the present day. By broadly incorporating the latest research on race and ethnicity into the field of military history, the book explores the major advances that have taken place in the past few decades at the intersection of these two fields. The discussion goes beyond the study of battles and generals to look at the other peoples who were involved in American military campaigns and analyzes how African Americans, Native Americans, Asian Americans, and Chicanos helped shape the course of American History—both at home and on the battlefield. The book also includes coverage of American imperial ambitions and the national response to encountering other peoples in their own countries. The Routledge Handbook of the History of Race in the American Military defines how the history of race and ethnicity impacts military history, over time and comparatively, while encouraging scholarship on specific groups, periods, and places. This important collection presents a comprehensive survey of the current state of the field.

The Abolition of Slavery the right of the government under the War Power. By William Lloyd Garrison

Guerrilla warfare, border fights, and unorganized skirmishes are all too often the only battles associated with Missouri during the Civil War. Combined with the state's distance from both sides' capitals, this misguided impression paints Missouri as an insignificant player in the nation's struggle to define itself. Such notions, however, are far from an accurate picture of the Midwest state's contributions to the war's outcome. Though traditionally cast in a peripheral role, the conventional warfare of Missouri was integral in the Civil War's development and ultimate conclusion. The strategic battles fought by organized armies are often lost amidst the stories of guerrilla tactics and bloody combat, but in The Civil War in Missouri, Louis S. Gerteis explores the state's conventional warfare and its effects on the unfolding of national history. Both the Union and the Confederacy had a vested interest in Missouri throughout the war. The state offered control of both the lower Mississippi valley and the Missouri River, strategic areas that could greatly factor into either side's success or failure. Control of St. Louis and mid-Missouri were vital for controlling the West, and rail lines leading across the state offered an important connection between eastern states and the communities out west. The Confederacy sought to maintain the Ozark Mountains as a northern border, which allowed concentrations of rebel troops to build in the Mississippi valley. With such valuable stock at risk, Lincoln registered the importance of keeping rebel troops out of Missouri, and so began the conventional battles investigated by Gerteis. The first book-length examination of its kind, The Civil War in Missouri: A Military History dares to challenge the prevailing opinion that Missouri battles made only minor contributions to the war. Gerteis specifically focuses not only on the principal conventional battles in the state but also on the effects these battles had on both sides' national aspirations. This work broadens the scope of traditional Civil War studies to include the losses and wins of Missouri, in turn creating a more accurate and encompassing narrative of the nation's history.

The Congressional Globe

Most Americans imagine the Civil War in terms of clear and defined boundaries of freedom and slavery: a straightforward division between the slave states of Kentucky and Missouri and the free states of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Kansas. However, residents of these western border states, Abraham Lincoln's home region, had far more ambiguous identities-and contested political loyalties-than we commonly assume. In The Rivers Ran Backward, Christopher Phillips sheds light on the fluid political cultures of the "Middle Border" states during the Civil War era. Far from forming a fixed and static boundary between the North and South, the border states experienced fierce internal conflicts over their political and social loyalties. White supremacy and widespread support for the existence of slavery pervaded the "free" states of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, which had much closer economic and cultural ties to the South, while those in Kentucky and Missouri held little identification with the South except over slavery. Debates raged at every level, from the individual to the state, in parlors, churches, schools, and public meeting places, among families, neighbors, and friends. Ultimately, the pervasive violence of the Civil War and the cultural politics that raged in its aftermath proved to be the strongest determining factor in shaping these states' regional identities, leaving an indelible imprint on the way in which Americans think of themselves and others in the nation. The Rivers Ran Backward reveals the complex history of the western border states as they struggled with questions of nationalism, racial politics, secession, neutrality, loyalty, and even place-as the Civil War tore the nation, and themselves, apart. In this major work, Phillips shows that the Civil War was more than a conflict pitting the North against the South, but one within the West that permanently reshaped American regions.

Speech on the Slavery Resolutions

Excerpt from Speech on the Slavery Resolutions: Delivered in the General Assembly Which Met in Detroit in May Last Mr. Moderator: - On this long-vexed question, at this very moment menacing more than ever the rupture of Church and State, permit me to express my strong conviction that he argues most cogently who argues most kindly. May I be assisted to remember this. I shall express myself with the earnestness of fresh investigation, but I beseech my brethren to interpret all my language as uttered under the conviction of ultimate fallibility, whatever may be the seeming confidence of the moment. Especially does it become me to cherish this remembrance when I call to mind that the South is the land of my birth, and the home of my kindred, and may well therefore be exerting a present influence over my judgment of which I am altogether unconscious. The Memorialists complain of the Southern Church, and charge her, not so much with slave-making, nor with slave-trading, as with slave-holding. They direct the attention of the Assembly to the character of this institution, and inquire concerning the method of its expulsion from the Presbyterian Body. Two solemn questions demand our investigation: What is the moral character of slaveholding? What the duties of the parties concerned? First. - The Moral Character of Slaveholding? It need hardly be stated that he who exerts a compulsory authority over a human being as a master, who holds a fellow-man in the relation of involuntary servitude, is the party implicated in the charge. Let it be premised that in this investigation we are bound to regard slaveholding in its most favorable aspect. Who are before us? The Southern Public at large? No, sir! We have nothing to do with it. It is the membership and the ministry of the Presbyterian Church who stand accused. They are our brethren and uncondemned. We are bound therefore in Christian justice to consider them as carrying out this relation with all the good feeling and principle of which its nature will admit. The Memorialists affirm that slaveholding is sin. If it is simply intended that slaveholding, in the language of the Majority Report, "leads to sin," I am prepared to yield my hearty assent. In the master, slaveholding insensibly tends to breed indolence, pride, impatience, irritability, hard-heartedness, and arbitrary temper. Speech of the Hon. Henry Clay, of Kentucky

Excerpt from Speech of R. E. Scott of Fauquier: On Certain Resolutions Touching the Action of Congress on the Subject of Slavery The resolutions reported by the joint committee on the Wilmot proviso and other kindred measures, being under consideration, Mr. Scott said: I think I have reason to complain of intolerance towards me on this floor. Scarcely had the gentleman from Spottsylvania, the mover of the resolutions, spoken ten minutes to his subject, when the gentleman from Stafford arrests his remarks, and deprecating discussion, in that solemn manner he so well knows how to assume, declares that he will feel surprise if the resolutions are assailed from any quarter; and this, too, after the determined opposition which in every stage of their progress I have evinced. I am not blind to the purpose of the movement. I know the force of the argument of numbers, potent with all, it is controlling with some, and I feel its effects in the diminished ranks of those with whom I stand on this occasion. On a former day I notified the house that when the resolutions reported by the committee should be called up, I would move, as a substitute for them, those which I then submitted for their consideration. Both sets of resolutions were printed, and after much time taken for examination, the friends of this action, dissatisfied with their tenor, called together the members of both branches of the assembly in free conference, and another set of resolutions were reported to the house, which, we were told, were to be moved as a substitute for the report of the committee. But scarcely had this been done, and a day fixed for the consideration of the subject, when the house, dissatisfied still with the manner in which the work was done, raised a second committee to which, in conjunction with a committee of the senate, the whole matter was referred, to be reported upon by this day; and we have now before us, in the resolutions just read by the clerk, the opinion of the joint committee as to the shape which our action should finally take. All these propositions differed very essentially from that which I submitted. And I regret that after the maturest reflection I feel myself unable to yield my approbation to either of the three. Whilst they differ in some respects from each other, and manifest a disposition on the part of the majority to retreat from the extreme ground assumed in the first series, there are, yet, certain vices common to them all, that preclude the possibility of my concurrence in them, and make it my duty, in the discharge of the trust here confided to me, to offer against their adoption the most earnest opposition. Speech on the Slavery Resolutions, Delivered in the General Assembly Which Met in Detroit in May 1848

Excerpt from Speech of R. E. Scott of Fauquier: On Certain Resolutions Touching the Action of Congress on the Subject of Slavery The resolutions under consideration rashly proposed this hazard. I object to them for that reason. I cannot say, as they require, that congress has no power under the constitution to prohibit the introduction of slavery into the newly acquired territories. Mr. Monroe, it is said, took the opinion of his cabinet on this question, and they unanimously advised that congress possessed the power. The distinguished senator from South Carolina, it is known, was a member of that cabinet. They proceed upon an unsound construction of the constitution, and declare a principle impairing its force. Before taking our seats in this assembly we severally took an oath to support the constitution of the United States. We will violate that oath in passing these resolutions. Speech of R. E. Scott of Fauquier

One of the most important speeches in the struggle to end slavery in the United States, this powerful address by Reverdy Johnson makes an impassioned case for the abolition of this inhumane institution. Speech of Mr. Downs, of Louisiana, on the Compromise Resolutions of Mr. Clay

Excerpt from Speech of Mr. Phelps, of Vermont, on the Subject of Slavery, &C: In Senate, January 23, 1850 Sir, gentlemen seem to have forgotten the expressive language of these men, when they regard the expression of similar sentiments in these resolutions as offensive to the South. Sir, let me advert to some of the opinions of Thomas Jefferson on this subject, and let me, at the same time, advert to the course of Virginia herself in relation to the introduction of this institution.
