Population Specific Genetic Diseases
Phenylketonuria (PKU) Phenylketonuria (PKU) is a rare autosomal recessive metabolic disorder. It is caused by a deficiency of the enzyme phenylalanine hydroxylase (PAH), which is responsible for the breakdown of the amino acid phenylalanine. Without this enzyme, phenylalanine builds up in the blood and can lead to intellectual disability and other health problems. PKU is most prevalent in populations of Northern European descent, with a frequency of approximately 1 in 10,000.
Sickle Cell Anemia Sickle cell anemia is a common inherited blood disorder, particularly prevalent in populations of African descent. It is caused by a mutation in the hemoglobin gene, leading to the production of abnormal hemoglobin (HbS). This abnormal hemoglobin causes red blood cells to become rigid and sticky, leading to chronic anemia, pain, and an increased risk of complications. The frequency of the sickle cell trait is approximately 1 in 10 in African American populations.
Tay-Sachs Disease Tay-Sachs disease is a rare, fatal autosomal recessive disorder. It is caused by a deficiency of the enzyme hexosaminidase A, which is responsible for the breakdown of a fatty substance called ganglioside. Without this enzyme, ganglioside builds up in the brain, leading to progressive neurological damage and death. Tay-Sachs disease is most prevalent in populations of Ashkenazi Jewish descent, with a frequency of approximately 1 in 3,000.
