We desire more openness and possibility in our lives, but our familiar sense of self and external limitations can restrict what seems possible, making us feel trapped and hopeless.

Our inner limitations restrict us, but being present allows us to experience a sense of possibility by challenging our beliefs about ourselves and what is possible.

Our childhood experiences shape our unconscious orientation towards seeking validation and attention through either good or bad behavior, leading us to evaluate our experiences as either good or bad and feel lost when we can't determine the outcome.

We tend to categorize experiences as good or bad, right or wrong, which influences how we judge and evaluate them, and the standards we learned in childhood can limit us in adulthood.

Participants engage in a repeating question exercise to explore and understand answers, discovering new insights and parts of themselves.

Discover yourself by asking the same question each time without changing your voice or intonation, and focus on being loving, caring, interested, humble, and not speaking out of turn.

Participants engage in a 5-minute exercise to express gratitude and communicate their needs, either with a partner or the speaker, emphasizing the importance of direct communication.

This teaching is a life-changing experience that allows people to open up and share vulnerable places of shame, resulting in newfound freedom.
