An assumption underlying the study of leadership is that leaders affect organizational performance PERFORMANCE The highest level leaders make the same assumption. A frequent antidote to major organizational problems is to replace the leader in the hope that the newly appointed leader will reverse performance problems.

INFLUENCE, The idea that leaders, actually influence, ...

RESULTS How leaders impact organizational (or unit) performance is the essential subject. For example, good results are attained by developing teamwork and formulating the right strategy.

SITUATION In contrast to the previous argument, the anti- leadership argument holds that the impact of the leader on organizational outcomes is smaller than the impact of forces within the situation.

SUBSTITUTES According to this viewpoint, many organizations have substitutes for leadership. Such substitutes are factors in the work environment that provide guidance and incentives to perform, making the leader's role almost superfluous.

GOAL When members of a cohesive, highly trained group are focused on a goal, they may require almost no leadership to accomplish their task.

ENGAGEMENT Employees who are engaged in work they find strongly self-motivating, or intrinsically satisfying, require a minimum of leadership.

PROFESSIONALS Workers who incorporate strong professional norms often require a minimum of supervision and leadership
