Introduction by Lonnie Bunch (NMAAHC) and Jim Grossman (AHA)

Panel chair Ira Berlin (University Of Maryland) describes how the common perception of a singular "blackness" arose when Africans of highly varied cultural and geographic backgrounds were forced into the shared experience of slavery.

Elsa Barkley Brown (University Of Maryland) explains how she uses the medium of film to teach "silent" or suppressed histories in introductory undergraduate classes on African American history.

Tiya Miles (University Of Michigan, Ann Arbor) discusses the ways in which African American and Native American communities forged transformative relationships under conditions of exploitation.

Dylan C. Penningroth (University of California, Berkeley) describes how many African Americans became fluent in legal procedure via the process of establishing churches, and how they began to apply this knowledge to struggles against racial injustice.

Deborah Gray White (Rutgers University, New Brunswick) considers the evolution of black identities within the context of the New Negro Movement (of the early twentieth century and newer conceptions of "postmodernity."
